survey was conducted to determine the amount of money that sport bettors in The United States. The survey was conducted by the National Bureau of Economic Research (NBER) in 2001. The results of the survey are as follows:

Wagering on sports is a popular activity in the United States. In 2001, approximately 10% of the adult population in the United States reported having placed a bet on a sporting event in the previous 12 months. The most popular sports for betting were football, basketball, and baseball. The average amount of money bet on a single event was $100. The majority of bets were placed on the home team.

The survey also found that the majority of bettors were male and had a high school or college education. The average age of bettors was 35 years old. The majority of bettors were from the Northeast and Midwest regions of the United States.

The survey also found that the majority of bettors were recreational bettors, meaning they bet for fun rather than as a source of income. The majority of bettors reported that they had never lost more than $100 on a single bet. The majority of bettors reported that they had never lost more than $1,000 on a single bet.
