Change to another country for university: how to deal with mobile tracking by mom

I am going to move to another country for university next year and my mother wants to put a tracker on my mobile phone to know where I am and if I am well. I don't want her to do that, not because I have something to hide, but because I would like to have some independence and privacy.

She has never been a particularly strict mother, but she is relentless on this issue. If I say that, she might think I am hiding something or that it will hurt her, so it might be one of the few ways for her to feel part of my life when I leave – which is not true, because I have plans to keep regular contact.

I don't know how to tell my mother that I don't want to be tracked without hurting her. What should I do?

Eleanor says: In my opinion, I share your preference for betting on the cup in this issue. One part of having independence from someone is having information that they don't have and that doesn't violate an expectation. A gap between childhood and adulthood, it can be a little strange for a father to say: "You didn't tell me you were going there/you would be doing this medical exam."

I suspect that the location will be just one aspect of this change in the betting on the cup relationship. It seems that the mother will miss a lot and it might be difficult with this transition.

You have to be careful not to let this weigh too much on you. If the separation from the betting on the cup mother starts to feel like a rejection or betrayal, it will be very difficult to do what is your most important job at this moment in life: discover your own "inner voice" of an adult.

You will have to deal with the structure of this problem other times in your life: someone to whom you care will feel sad or disconnected if you make a particular choice, even if it is what they really want. Many people, especially older ones, put their betting on the cup in confusion because they are so incapable of tolerating this consequence that they only make decisions by asking what will cause the least pain to others. This compromises the betting on the cup's ability to make decisions por si mesmo instead of as a collection of pains and desires of other people.

This is a good moment to practice tolerating this discomfort: "Mom, I love you, but I just don't feel like it, sorry." You can offer an alternative that addresses her concerns about security without providing betting on the cup real-time information, like a watch with an alert button that can be used in case of need.

It is especially difficult to do this when the person who is hurt is not just a nuisance
