Choque na França: Macron desafia a extrema-direita vaidebet criacao eleição antecipada

A painful defeat and a surprising stop.

The French president Emmanuel Macron saw his party fall to second place in the European Parliament elections in France on Sunday, with the two main far-right parties together winning nearly 40% of the votes.

When Jordan Bardella, the leader of the far-right Rally National party, called Macron to dissolve the French National Assembly on Sunday night, it seemed to be a political positioning, based on his success in the European elections.

"The President of the Republic cannot remain deaf to the message sent by the French tonight," he said to his supporters.

Macron called his bluff.

Announcing a national election ahead of time for the end of June, Macron set up a confrontation between his pro-European, centrist and pro-Ukrainian ideals and the anti-immigration, populist and hardline far-right.

Um desafio à extrema-direita

Macron will try to mobilize the right and the left, urging his supporters to join together and vote against the far-right, but it is not clear how certain this will be.

The first round of voting will take place 20 days later, a narrow window to form a coalition from the mosaic of centrist and left-wing parties in France.

It seems there is little appetite to join Macron on the left, frustrated after years of large-scale protests against the far-right agenda of pro-business, and divided from within by divisions over the Gaza war.

The last time a French president dissolved the National Assembly was in 1997. Jacques Chirac lost a majority and the left came to power.

In an interview on Monday morning, the French Foreign Minister, Stéphane Séjourné, said that the Renaissance party of Macron was open to abstaining from competing for seats with other potential allies.

Séjourné said on Radio France that the party would discuss such a move with "reasonable people with whom we can work."

On Sunday night, the popular far-left party France Insoumise (FI) seemed to have refused to take part in such a move.

"Now it is clear that the country wants to turn the page in the Macron era. This page should not be turned with the far-right and the extreme-right," Manon Aubry, leader of the European list of FI, said to her supporters.

A figurehead of FI, Jean-Luc Mélenchon, said there was no reason to join other partidos à esquerda, especialmente com a pequena janela para formar uma coligação.
