MPs express concern over preparedness for inspections en relación con el Brexit

Los miembros del Parlamento han sembrado dudas sobre la preparación del gobierno del Reino Unido para los controles fronterizos posteriores al Brexit, que están previstos para la próxima semana, afirmando que una reducción de sus planes parecía representar un sexto retraso en su introducción tan esperada.

El comité selecto de medio ambiente, alimentos y asuntos rurales (EFRA) ha escrito al gobierno para exigir claridad sobre la naturaleza exacta de las inspecciones físicas de productos vegetales y alimenticios, después de que surgiera que estas podrían verse significativamente reducidas debido a los temores de retrasos en la frontera.

Implementación de controles fronterizos

El martes, el gobierno tiene previsto iniciar chequeos de las importaciones de medio y alto riesgo de la UE de plantas y animales, como parte de su Plan de Modelo Operativo de Frontera Objetivo (BTOM).

Sin embargo, el Financial Times informó la semana pasada de que gran parte del sistema de gestión de riesgos para todos los grupos de mercancías no se activaría inicialmente, después de que dentro del gobierno surgieran preocupaciones de que los sistemas fronterizos no estarían completamente listos.

El gobierno insistió en que los chequeos comenzarían, pero dijo que algunos se retrasarían, con los inspectores centrándose en los productos de mayor riesgo antes de avanzar hacia un régimen más comprensivo en el futuro.

Demanda de claridad

Robert Goodwill, el presidente del comité EFRA, exigió al gobierno claridad sobre los últimos retrasos y detalles sobre lo que implicaría un enfoque gradual de los chequeos sanitarios y fitosanitarios (SPS) en la práctica.
