Summary of news from Down to Earth: Climate crisis in Europe

This is a summary of the newsletter from Down to Earth this week, to receive more journalism exclusive in your email every Friday, sign up {nn}

It is common to think of the climate crisis as something that will happen in the future, globally. However, recent investigations have shown that the impacts of extreme flooding are already happening in Europe.

Extreme flooding in Europe is a reality and is happening now due to the increase in global temperature. Climatologists have found that a 1°C increase in temperature means that 7% more water is held in the air, increasing the risk of flooding.

The destruction caused by flooding is comparable to a disaster movie. In the Ahr region, in Germany, the water level reached 10 meters, destroying bridges, roads and homes.

Some scientists believe that the flooding of 2024 in Central Europe, specifically in Belgium and Germany, was worsened by the climate crisis.

What is terrifying is that flooding of similar magnitude can happen again in Central Europe, and some scientists believe that this will happen one or two times before 2050. But people are not prepared.
