Terremoto atinge Taiwan e deixa nove mortos

Um terremoto de magnitude 7,4 atingiu a costa leste de Taiwan nesta quarta-feira (3), leaving nine people dead and over 900 injured. The earthquake, which occurred at 07:58 local time, was felt across the island and triggered at least nine aftershocks of magnitude 4 or higher.

The earthquake struck near the city of Hualien, which is located near the Taroko National Park, a popular tourist destination. The city has a population of around 300,000 people and is linked to the rest of Taiwan by major roads and railways.

The impact of the earthquake was felt across the island, with buildings collapsing, roads crumbling, and power outages reported. The Taiwanese semiconductor company TSMC announced that it had evacuated its employees from its factories in Hsinchu and southern Taiwan for safety reasons.

The earthquake also triggered a tsunami alert for Taiwan's coastal regions, as well as for the Japanese coast. The Japanese meteorological agency initially issued a tsunami warning for waves up to 3 meters high, but later cancelled it.

The earthquake was also felt in Fujian province in southeastern China.

Rescue teams are racing against time to save those trapped in collapsed buildings. The Taiwanese government has mobilized its military and emergency services to respond to the disaster.

This is the strongest earthquake to hit Taiwan in 25 years, and the Taiwanese Prime Minister has called for national unity and cooperation in the aftermath of the disaster.

The earthquake's epicenter was located at a depth of 15.5 kilometers, and it triggered a series of landslides, including one that killed five hikers near Taroko National Park.

The Taiwanese government has set up an emergency response center to coordinate relief efforts and provide support to those affected by the disaster.
